the 1990s, the number of people in the world who are under 15 years of age is expected to increase by 1.5 billion (United Nations 1994).

There is a growing awareness of the need to address the needs of children in the 1990s. The United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF) has been instrumental in this regard, and has produced a series of reports on the state of the world's children (UNICEF 1990, 1991, 1992, 1993, 1994). These reports have highlighted the need for a new approach to children's rights, and have led to the adoption of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (UNCRC) in 1989.

The UNCRC is a landmark document in the history of children's rights. It sets out the rights of children, and provides a framework for the development of national legislation and policies. The Convention has been ratified by over 100 countries, and is now the most widely ratified human rights treaty in the world.

The UNCRC has led to a new approach to children's rights, and has provided a framework for the development of national legislation and policies. It has also led to a new approach to the study of children's rights, and has provided a framework for the development of research in this area.

The UNCRC is a landmark document in the history of children's rights. It is the first time that children have been recognized as individuals with rights, and not just as passive recipients of adult care. The UNCRC sets out a range of rights for children, including the right to life, the right to health, the right to education, and the right to participate in decisions that affect them.

The UNCRC has been ratified by over 100 countries, and is now the most widely accepted international instrument for the protection of children's rights. It provides a framework for the development of national laws and policies, and for the monitoring of progress in the implementation of children's rights.

One of the key challenges in the implementation of the UNCRC is the need to ensure that children's rights are protected in all circumstances, and not just in the context of the family. This requires a new approach to children's rights, one that recognizes the need for a range of measures to be taken to protect children's rights in all areas of life.

Obesity is a complex condition, with many causes and consequences. It is a major risk factor for a number of chronic diseases, including heart disease, diabetes, and certain types of cancer. Obesity is also associated with a number of psychological problems, including depression and low self-esteem. In addition, obesity can lead to a number of physical problems, including joint pain and difficulty breathing.

There are many reasons why people become obese. One of the most common reasons is a combination of poor diet and lack of exercise. In the United States, the average person consumes more calories than they burn, leading to weight gain. In addition, many people lead sedentary lifestyles, which also contributes to weight gain.

Obesity is a complex condition, and there are many different ways to treat it. Some people may benefit from diet and exercise, while others may need more intensive treatment, such as medication or surgery. It is important to consult with a healthcare professional to determine the best treatment plan for each individual.
